JANESVILLE, Sept. 26.

To-day opens most beautifully, and the attendance of fifteen promises. A finer and more encouraging season for a Fair could not be wished than Janesville has enjoyed for the past week. The people evidently are determined to make the most of their opportunity. Although a severe rain here would materially damage the success of the Fair, the prospects are in the late Illinois State Fair, owing to the fact that the ground on which this Fair is located is high and well drained. Everything looks favorable for a large display of cattle, which from present appearances will be unusually large, as the "promised feature for the special encouragement," etc., etc.

The Secretary of the State census of Massachusetts have been received from all but thirteen towns, and the aggregate is 1,231,065. The Governor's message is expected, will make the aggregate population nearly 1,251,000, and the voters about 260,000. The increase in voters since the census of 1860 is about 41,000.

In less than twenty-four hours after the fire in Augusta, Me., every lot in the burnt district was under contract for rebuilding, upon which operations were commenced at once. The energy displayed by parties in the city, and work was continued during many the exhibition progressed by letting the contracts, and in many cases commenced on the ground.

The U. S. District Attorney for Iowa has commenced proceedings against the property of Gen. Price, and has attached a number of horses, but authorized a delivery of the property upon the application of the Confederate quartermaster that he supports the horses for the use of the army. The Marshal has also attached the property of Gen. Shelby.

It is probable that the Secretary of the Treasury will be empowered to convert the balance of the 10-40 loan into 6 per cent. bonds.

There is a failure to connect it in the assessment to apply immediately or to-day, but probably to-morrow.

Gen. Grant met with an enthusiastic reception at Indianapolis yesterday, upon which occasion he addressed the people from the balcony of the Bates House. It will be found in full in our columns this morning. He was to leave last night for Cincinnati en route.

The Iowa State Fair opened yesterday with brilliant prospects. In agricultural implements and machinery the display is large. Our correspondent says the display of horses is the best he has seen in the west. The Secretary of the Treasury has issued a circular to the effect that the Secretary of War has authorized the delivery of captured property to loyal claimants upon the application of the Quartermaster General.

A VISION.

Twas lately a Vision I came to see
Not Sunday or night, or shadow of dim
For a time I could hardly discern
Amongst the confusion of things around me,
With a rushing, ring and a dangerous rent,
Loud over my senses and mind.

But recovered full soon, and I found myself
Where I stood before, only grand
Was the change that had come to my vision in the city,
The mansions and streets of the night had Risen
Like a city of the Lord descending.

Weighed and Advertised Books.

The London Stationer says that several months from the large booksellers of Boston, New York, and Philadelphia, and over these months a heavy purchasers of books of no' immediate, and expensive character. The number of orders received by this fall's orders are vast of 1000.

The quaint bulky for the properties of American book-publishers. The cost of these books in the American purchaser is very small, but when, in addition to the English cost he has to pay transportation, twenty per cent gold duty, and the American bookseller's profit of fifty per cent, the price of the work is somewhat dear, bringing the expense up to three or four times the original cost. It is from these that American booksellers might supply the great demand for fine books. The New York Tribune, in speaking of the subject, makes some judicious criticisms on the distinctive character of American copyright books. It says:

We need but look at the catalogue of the leading book trade which books are printed and bound in England, to see that the great bulk of them are sent to the binder, before they are dry, and which are soon in a state of dilapidation. They are figured by rule-setting—that is, by the same rule which governs the setting of the type. Many and many a page of well known books look as though the printer had set the type by the pound, and then cut off the number of pounds he had set. The regularity of the lines, and the exact number of words in each line, are the most conspicuous features in books otherwise very pretty. But the great evil is that the books are not made to last. They are made to be sold, and to be read once or twice, and then to be thrown aside. Now, we do not say that we will never buy any thing but what is well printed, and will last for ages; but we do say that we will not buy books which are printed in such a manner that they will not last for ages. We will not buy books which are printed in such a manner that they will not last for ages. We will not buy books which are printed in such a manner that they will not last for ages.

The Times shows its protest against a nuisance that really needs abating:

We see that the Common Council has voted more noisy horns—horns, we might almost say, with an accompaniment of bells. If this has given to be necessary, of late, for publishers to issue their books in such a way that they will be read once and then thrown away, we protest against the necessity. Many of the most valuable books in the world have been published in such a way that they will be read once and then thrown away, we protest against the necessity. Many of the most valuable books in the world have been published in such a way that they will be read once and then thrown away, we protest against the necessity.

Death of the Widow of Tom Moore.

[From the London Times, Sept. 5.]

On September 4, at Sloperton Cottage, Mrs. Moore, widow of the late Thomas Moore, Esq., author of "Lalla Rookh," aged sixty-eight. This is an interesting event in the death of the last scene of a glorious summer has at length disappeared. Few are now left of the brilliant company who graced the early part of the nineteenth century, and whose names are famous in our literature. Of those whose names none is or will be held in more kindly remembrance than that of the lady to whom the poet Moore gave his name. Not only loved her—he was proud of her, and it is delightful to see in his letters and in his diaries with what eagerness he sounded her praises. He writes to his mother in 1813:

"You cannot imagine what a sensation Bessy excited at the ball the other night. She was prettily dressed, and looked, I think, very beautiful. I never saw so much admiration excited. It strikes everybody almost that sees her how like Titian's looks and expression of her face are to Catalani's."

And so through all his letters and journals, he is never tired of referring to her—quoting what she said, telling what she did, describing her looks and dress, recording how she was admired. He married her in 1811, and her history is summed up in this one passage that she was the delight of his life. She does not appear to occupy a great place in his poetry; but it is one of the curious traits of many a poet that he is excited to sing less by the inspirations of his heart than by the imaginary heroine, or by some beauty that kindles a passing flame. Mrs. Moore was not a Lalla Rookh, nor a Norah Creina, nor a Highland Mary, destined in song to live forever; but as mistress and lady of Sloperton, if not more, she was a poet's idol.

She died at three o'clock on the morning of September 4, but for some days before she knew that she was dying; and she said she did not wish to live, because she felt that remained to us of the Moore family, and now that she has departed, we begin to feel a loneliness, how great we can scarcely tell, left to connect the present generation of letters with the past.

A New Trade—Importations from Stockholm to Philadelphia.

[From the Philadelphia North American, Sept. 5.]

The first vessel from Greenland, that ever arrived here came into port yesterday morning, and was consigned to the Pennsylvania Salt Manufacturing Company of this city, being the first cargo of ice which has ever been received here. The trade is almost at an end. The brigantine is moored at one of the hills near by the harbor where it is shipped. From it [illegible] made cheaper only in this country by the Pennsylvania Salt Company, and on which 40,000 tons have been manufactured this year. The glue factories of Pittsburgh alone use 5,000 tons per annum. Though it cannot be shipped [illegible] and a half cents per pound, it is [illegible] Pittsburgh, and [illegible] Ohio. [illegible] Ohio.

The Times is much wanted, since the battle of Mobile has so much shaken the confidence in the Confederacy.

With the preceding gunnery that, I close this letter. Its good enough to believe me always,

Very sincerely yours,

W. DUNBRANE.

Prince de Joinville to a Gentleman at Washington.

[From the Boston Advertiser, Sept.]

The letter by Prince de Joinville, which is now first given to the public through our columns, although written in the course of private correspondence with a distinguished citizen, nevertheless claims attention and regard from the fact that the writer is going to visit it upon matters of great public interest. The writer, as our readers know, was trained in the French navy, and is one of the gentlemen which his birth might have secured him, prevailed him to enter the army or the navy. The rank of Admiral which he attained was well-earned by his mastery of the science of naval warfare. In both of these both belligerents have long since testified their high appreciation and esteem for him, what pertains to their special pursuit.

Orleans Hotel, Washington, August 27, 1865.

Dear Sir: Just as I was going to write you to congratulate you upon the great achievements of your armies, and to express to you the good of the faith, and I have to mourn with you the recent death of your illustrious chief. The voice of posterity is already speaking, and will not hesitate to place the name of Washington at the head of the great, honest and free men.

The name of Washington is, indeed, a universal in Europe, although with a great deal of alarm for the future. Many of the friends of liberty have always had faith in your country, and I have still. Your country will find in it, as in other points worthy of the task they have so perfectly begun. They only need to be warned of that task will be made much easier. I earnestly hope that it will be undertaken, and that it will be for the good of his country and the salvation of his people.

But if he was to succumb, we have here, in Louis, in his 17 years old son, the heir of the name, who has very strongly impressed me with his high mind and ability to be one day worthy of his father. I am sure that his self-possession, his calmness, his clear understanding, should love to have his military inspections, as Dr. N. by his side, and that he is entitled to receive a friendly and useful visit.
